It Would Take a Miracle

Sam Aurelius Milam III

In 391, Christians burned many of the documents in the library at Alexandria, which was probably the most important body of recorded knowledge in existence at the time. They claimed that the documents contained pagan heresies.

In 782, several thousand Saxons, under the control of Charlemagne, were murdered at his orders because they refused to convert to Christianity.

Beginning in 1095, Christians on Crusades killed thousands of Muslims. Although it might be an exaggeration, it's been said that during Christian raids of some of the Muslim towns, Muslim blood ran knee deep in the streets. Even today, almost a thousand years after the Crusades began, there are still Christian soldiers fighting in Muslim lands.

Beginning in the 1100s, the various institutions of the Inquisition tortured or killed thousands of people who were accused of heresy.

During the time of the Cathar suppression, from some time in the 1100s to some time in the 1300s, Christians burned thousands of Cathars at the stake. They claimed that the Cathars were heretics.

In 1349, in Switzerland, Germany, and France, Christians slaughtered thousands of Jews. The Christians claimed that the Jews were the source of the Black Death.

In the 1500s, Catholic priests, traveling with the conquistadors, destroyed most of the Mayan codices, an irreplaceable body of recorded knowledge. As in Alexandria, they did it because they believed that the documents contained pagan heresies.

From about 1450 to about 1750, during the witch-hunts, Christians tortured or murdered an estimated 200,000 alleged witches.

There were an estimated ten million indigenous people living on this continent when the Christians began to arrive here from Europe. The Christians regarded the natives as heathens. Native cultures and languages were suppressed. Native religions were outlawed. People who practiced those religions were murdered. Native children were forcibly taken from their parents and brainwashed in schools established for that specific purpose. After 350 years of such treatment, and worse, the size of the native population had been reduced to less than 4% of its previous number. It was Charlemagne's options all over again, but far worse. Even the Mongol invasion of Europe seems like a trifling event by comparison. So far as I'm aware, the Christian invasion of this continent was the closest thing to an actually successful genocide that has ever happened, in the known history of human society.

Have Christians changed their ways? The only difference nowadays, at least in this country, and most of the time, is that Christians don't do the dirty deeds themselves. A single example will suffice to illustrate the point. Why is polygamy illegal? It's illegal because Christians believe that it's a sin. Today, Christians don't burn such people at the stake. Instead, they get the legislatures, the police, the courts, and the prisons to do their dirty work for them. Then, they can wash their hands of it, sit safely at home, and pretend to be loving, tolerant, and forgiving.

So long as Christians use the government to impose their dogma, and to punish violators, they haven't changed. They're still imposing their beliefs by force, and punishing heretics. That behavior constitutes a violation of the separation of church and state, which means both keeping the government out of religion and keeping religion out of the government. In addition to that, Christians are violating the idea of freedom of religion. If freedom of religion is to exist at all, then it must necessarily include freedom from religion. If Christians impose their beliefs onto people who don't agree with them, via government or otherwise, then there isn't any freedom of religion. As Heinlein noted in Glory Road, "Culturologists state a 'law' of religious freedom which they say is invariant: Religious freedom in a cultural complex is inversely proportional to the strength of the strongest religion." So long as Christians use the government to enforce their beliefs, there is neither separation of church and state, nor freedom of religion.

Will Christians ever change their evil ways? Regardless of their occasional rhetoric of love and tolerance, the legacy of their past suggests to me that the answer is, probably not. 🦅

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sam:

What do you think of Julian Assange, Chelsea [Bradley] Manning, and Edward Snowden?

—Sir Donald the Elusive

I admire the intentions of anybody who tries to oppose the evils of government. Note, however, Henry David Thoreau's admonition that "There are a thousand hacking at the branches of evil to one who is striking at the root...." Thomas Paine noted that government is a necessary evil. Maybe it isn't necessary, but only inevitable, because people want a government to solve their problems for them, instead of solving their problems for themselves. See Anarchy, Monarchy, Malarkey, in Pharos.

Whether government is necessary or merely inevitable, I believe that it is inherently evil and cannot be made otherwise. For now, the only remedy that I can suggest is explained in my essay Abandonment, and justified in my essay The Long and Winding Doctrine: Social Contract. Both essays are available in Pharos.

Dear Sam....

There is a curious occurrence that each of the stamps on letters coming into the prison are torn/lifted to a corner to "see what is under them?" Seems awfully time-consuming to me, but we have not been told why....

Glad your State is opened! CA is barely 1/3rd open and the school year is a MESS! I am really sick of getting nothing but Democratic/Communitistic Entertainment/News where no serious topics of conversation are allowed!! Journalism has gone the way of the incandescent light bulb!! Where is the FCC when you need it?

I have heard stories on Rush Limbaugh about hydroxychloroquine and ivermectin being used by doctors all over the world with 100% success rate given to people who have COVID-19! Even a NY assemblyman and his brother, yet I can get no info on either drug from our pharmacist or medical doctor off the "Internet"!! Some doctor in Australia was using ivermectin on her COVID-19 patients, and they all got better!!

Well Sam, more next time. Take care, and be well! Enjoy.

Anything that keeps the young people out of school, even a virus, has at least that one virtue. See Training Camps, on page 2 of the December 2008 issue and Enemies of Liberty, on page 2 of the April 2011 issue.

In an editorial reply on page 3 of the April 2020 issue, I commented that the eventual re- sults of the coronavirus would be to enable governments to get stronger, to reinforce people's notions that they can't survive without their governments, and to encourage people to be submissive to their governments.

I recently saw part of a news report about the coronavirus. I don't remember which nation was mentioned in the report but its government was reportedly encouraging the use of a certain cell phone app that caused cell phones that contained the app to automatically detect one another when they were in close proximity to one another. Notification was automatically uploaded to a database that then contained a record of any possible contact between the carriers of the cell phones. I haven't seen a subsequent report so I don't know if the system was actually put into use. The alleged purpose was to help to trace the transfer of the virus from one person to another. Such a system, if it's actually used, will be justified as an epidemiological tool but it will be used as a surveillance tool. Governments have actually used cell phones as targets. See Snowden, about 1 hour and 21 minutes into the movie. Whether or not that particular example is credible, such a system could provide a lot of targets. Why would any government want to eliminate a virus that provides such a handy excuse for increasing its police state powers? There's more value to government in controlling such a virus at a sustainable level than there is in eliminating it. See Beyond Paranoia, on page 2 of the May 2017 issue.

Hey Sam,

I know that you've got a limited amount of print space, so I'll keep this comment brief, but here in Arkansas there is an all black TV channel on 5-2 called "Bounce".... Also, have you noticed that now in every major city across America, they've been forced to rename one of their good white streets, "Martin Luther King Blvd."?

I am also sure that you've seen on the news that blacks in Tennessee have successfully gotten all of our historical Robert E. Lee monuments removed and destroyed....

—Howie in the Max

Yes, I'm aware of the Bounce TV network. There's also a network called Black Entertainment Television. In the course of my work, I've encountered references to black journals, black business associations, black colleges, black scholarships, a Congressional Black Caucus, a National Society of Black Physicists, a National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a United Negro College Fund, and a National Association of Black Scuba Divers. →

So, while black people have been complaining about racially biased white institutions, they've been creating racially biased black institutions. Lately, I've seen people carrying signs proclaiming that black lives matter but I don't see any indication that any of those people care about white lives. I don't know how to solve the problem of racism but I expect that such hypocrisy will probably make things worse. Imagine the reaction if I started a Professional Society of White Nuclear Engineers.

The destruction of Confederate monuments reminds me of the destruction of historical sites in Iraq, Syria, and Libya, by ISIL. I suppose that I shouldn't be too critical about that kind of thing, at the risk of being a hypocrite myself, because I wouldn't mind at all if somebody destroyed the monument at Mt. Rushmore. It's a reminder of our own evil behavior, an insult to the native peoples, and a desecration of their holy land. Maybe there's a bit of the desire for retribution in each of us. —editor

Dear Sam

Hello, how are you. Staying healthy I pray.

So, 9/11 [the date of his letter], a day that in my opinion will always be a reminder of how much our government will deceive its own people to achieve its own purposes. Anywho, your Sept '20 Frontiersman was another great issue. In "A Fictional Speculation", I never thought about it the way you put it. I figured Trump has been downplaying the virus so it would explode, so a week or two before election, he would declare a "national emergency" and close all federal institutions and services, meaning, no mail, no polling stations, etc. But your version of an executive order demanding a "new vote" seems very feasible.

I also see him trying to declare all votes after Nov 3rd invalid because 70% of Democrats want to vote by mail this cycle due to the virus. Either way, I think we're in for a bumpy ride with Trump and the Republicans taking a huge shit on the constitution and American citizen's rights....

And now, to your "A Quick, Impromptu Survey", you surveyed 17 channels, I get between 85 and 116 channels, so let's say 100 average. Your survey showed about half. I guarantee,

Funds

Sam Aurelius Milam III

My primary source of cash came to an end about four years ago. Since then, I've mostly been using what I'd previously saved. Even though I'm 74 years old, and even though I'm being stingy with my funds, it seems possible that I might outlive them. Maybe not, one that wasn't during prime-time, because I did a survey between 7 PM to 11 PM and the result on advertising was about 80 to 90% black or people of color, some commercial blocks of 10 minutes were all black, not one white person seen.

I agree with you. I don't think black people are saddled with more problems, they just get all of the exposure. They're good at sowing "white guilt". I agree racism is alive and well, but in "opportunities" blacks have just as much of a chance as whites. Today, our real problems are because of the disparities caused by income gaps. The "rich" get it, the "poor" don't.

Well, take care my friend!

Sincerely,

—S. H., a prisoner

Fourteen million people were killed in the Nazi concentration camps. For most of my life, I'd heard that 6 million Jews were killed there. I was surprised to learn that there were victims other than the Jews, and that there were so many of them. The Jews accounted for less than half of the total, yet we hear only of the Jews. Now, black people complain of the number of black people killed by cops, yet they seem to be indifferent to the deaths of white people.

It seems that such behavior might be all too common for victim advocacy groups. Ideally, I'd expect that any legitimate such group would be concerned for all similarly situated victims, not just for people of its own color or creed. A narrow concern, within any such group, for its own members only, to the exclusion of any concern for other similarly situated victims, suggests to me not a pursuit of justice, but a pursuit of power and privilege.

I can't help but to wonder, just a little, about claims of present day victimization from people who seem, nowadays, to be so well organized and to have such easy access to publicity. I keep thinking about those Jews, who constituted 43% of the victims and commanded 100% of the publicity. Maybe the victims who make the most noise aren't necessarily the most numerous or even the most victimized. Maybe it's just better publicity. It looks like we've discovered a general principle in operation. The squeaky wheel gets the grease. Anybody can do his own survey and make his own decision. —editor never knows for sure, but it seems possible. If I last longer than the funds do, then it's going to be difficult for me to pay for things, including the publication of this newsletter and the maintenance of my websites and domain names. So, donations are welcome. Maybe somebody might even buy something from the Moonlight Flea Market. 🐾

• A female brain cell inadvertently wandered into a man's head. She looked around and couldn't find anything. The head was completely empty. She started to get frightened and called, "Hello? Hello? Is there anybody here?"

As her plea echoed around in the empty head, she heard from far, far away, a male brain cell calling, "Hey! We're all down here!"
