Little Bang Theory

Sam Aurelius Milam III

There was a bang, and everything came flying out of it. There were planets, stars, galaxies, and even clusters of galaxies. Why not? If something can come out of nothing, then anything can come out of nothing.

So, the planets, stars, galaxies, and clusters of galaxies all went whizzing off in all directions, while the people on the planets studied archeology. People? Why not? If planets, stars, galaxies, and even clusters of galaxies can come out of nothing, then people can come out of nothing. If they studied archeology, then they found fossils. Why not? If planets, stars, galaxies, and even clusters — and so forth.

As the planets, stars, galaxies, clusters of galaxies, people, and fossils all whizzed out into the ever-expanding universe, it all moved slower and slower, because it was all moving up a gravitational gradient. That's how gravity works. Eventually, it all stopped.

Then, the planets, stars, galaxies, clusters of galaxies, people, and fossils all fell back toward the center, back toward the starting point, because that's the way gravity works, all the way back to nothing, just like before the bang. In just three generations of people, everything was gone. After all, it wasn't a big bang, just a little one.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sam,

I enjoyed your March '24 Frontiersman. The 1st article about fathers or mothers determining the sex of a baby [To Be Deceived....], your viewpoint is an interesting way of looking at it, and true. Anyway, I just wanted to write a quick letter to say thank you for the Frontiersman. It continues to be a source of thoughtful reading. Especially in the midst of the turmoil our government has become. There is no good choice for the upcoming election. Republicans are running a lying, convicted sex offender. The Democrats are running someone who babysat Jesus, and both sides spending has put our country in the poorhouse, and an irreversible downward spiral. You ought to run for Commander in Chief. I'd vote for you....

... Your article, "The Power of Babel" [April, page 1] is an interesting read. Me, I've always been somewhat of an etymologist. I like to research words in general. Especially, archaic ones. I like to find a word's genesis, and note the change in its usage over time. An example would be like you did in the word "fascism", from the dictionary meaning from 1941 to 1991 [War of Words, December 1994].

Go on line and look up the newest 2020 Scrabble dictionary. Holy shit has the new generations become verbally lazy. "Za" is now considered a word, meaning "pizza". When it comes to proper usage of vocabulary, we're going backwards, to where one day in the future, we will revert to "hoots" and "grunts" of a caveman bygone era.

Also, Sir Donald the Elusive's rant on dictatorship was an interesting read [April, page 2]. His writing shows his age. I feel like a curmudgeon myself by agreeing with him, but I'll admit, my overly idealistic days are gone too. Today's generation is doomed none the less. The 70's, even most of the 80's were great, as Archie would say, "Those were the days."

Have a good day, —S. H., a prisoner
Sam,

I want to encourage all prisoners in every state across America to file federal lawsuits against their prison to force them to comply with federal anti slavery laws to end prisoner slavery by forcing them to pay you at least minimum wage for every hour you work! Let them know we no longer work for free! We prisoners do not support slavery! Slavery is very cruel and unusual punishment! And I promise you a federal jury will agree and they will award you damages.... —Howie in the Max

Dear Frontiersman

Your articles about overpopulation have set me thinking about modern medical care. I wonder if it is altogether good for humanity.

Of course, the vast majority of people want to live long, pain free lives, with all the attributes that are associated with a healthy, "normal", human body. Modern science has discovered wondrous techniques for prolonging life, and for curing or mitigating many physical problems. However, modern medical science ig- → nores (for the most part) the problems of overpopulation and over use of material resources. The human race is headed for a crash, unless something is done to avert it.

Until about one hundred and seventy years ago, medical science was so undeveloped that doctors could do little to conserve life. Even the most highly trained doctors were functioning within a framework of theories that we now know to be false. Death rates were very high, and life expectancy was short, but somehow, people managed to enjoy their lives, and to accomplish many things. The possibility of early or sudden death was simply accepted, as a natural part of life.

If modern people were asked to sacrifice high-tech medical care, they would be horrified, and anyone who proposed such a thing would be accused of advocating mass murder, or genocide, or maybe both.

I know that the desire to preserve one's life appears to be a natural instinct. However, I believe that how the instinct is expressed is shaped or channeled by cultural programming.

For example, freeways are hazardous, and every year hundreds of people are killed in transportation accidents, but we calmly tolerate freeways. In California, most public buildings display signs proclaiming that the buildings contain cancer causing substances. These signs are routinely ignored.

I can imagine a world in which the use of high-tech medicine was restricted to young people. This restriction would not be enforced by state punishments of any type. Instead it would be enforced by new social norms of taste and manners. People who were past say, fifty, would be scorned and ostracized if they used high-tech medicine to prolong their lives (absent some compelling social reason).

Such a cultural change would cause a slow down in the rate of resource depletions — at least that's what I think.

What do you think? — Sir Donald the Elusive

Regarding your comment about people making accusations of genocide, both the definition of the word and the understanding of the idea have been corrupted. Properly defined, genocide is the complete extermination of an entire population or culture. It's the same usage as with murder. That is, you can't call it murder if the victim survives. In that case, it's only attempted murder. Similarly, you can't call it genocide if some members of the population survive. Consequently, genocide is rare because there are almost always survivors. Even the Nazi Holocaust wasn't genocide, but only attempted genocide. It was an atrocity, but not genocide, because some of the Jews, and their culture, survived. An atrocity, however bad, isn't necessarily genocide.

*Regarding the problem of resource depletion, even at the present level of our population, the consequences of overpopulation are accumulating faster than they can be resolved. Thus, even if we were able to stabilize our population at it's present level, that still wouldn't solve the problem. I believe that we're not going to solve the problem at all. I believe that, when things get bad enough, then the problem will solve itself. Of course, doomsday has been predicted before and didn't happen as predicted. Maybe we'll be lucky again. Maybe not. I don't know. Anyway, here's my best guess at the timing, starting with the King's College London estimate that I mentioned in Survival Instinct, in the September 2023 issue.*

Date	World Population Estimate
May 2025	9 billion
May 2026	10 billion
November 2026	11 billion
February 2027	12 billion
February 2028	50 million (m, not b)

*Finally, a society in which particular groups of people would be excluded from certain kinds of medical services, by being "scorned and ostracized", sounds a lot like societies that we already have. I don't know how to solve the problem but maybe somebody else will think of something better. Also, see Ravin' Evermore, in Pharos.*

REAL Women With REAL Authority

Sam Aurelius Milam III

Back when I was still working as a nuclear engineer at GE, in San Jose, California, I had an account at the credit union. I walked into the building one day, and told the teller that I wanted to withdraw $15 from my account. She didn't exactly smirk, but she did seem to be mightily happy to tell me that the rules wouldn't allow it. She told me, with a smile that wasn't exactly vindictive, that the minimum allowable withdrawal was $25. I asked why I couldn't decide for myself how much to withdraw from my own account. Her smile was just slightly more frosty as she assured me, with what seemed to be thinly veiled glee, that a $15 withdrawal wasn't allowed. I submitted to her restrictions and withdrew $25. She did a bit of paperwork, handed me my $25, looked smugly at the next person in line, and said "Next, please." I said, "Wait a minute. I'm not through yet." She looked nonplussed. Not quite annoyed, just nonplussed. I told her that I wanted to deposit $10 into my account. She became annoyed. She grimly took my deposit and gave me a receipt. I walked out with my $15 withdrawal. The credit union was a bastion of economic freedom and the teller was a real woman, with real authority.

Many years ago, while I was still living at Mere Keep, I visited some bookstore, the name of which I've long since forgotten. I noticed a door to a dimly lit back room. The door was labeled "Adults Only". There was a woman nearby, stacking books on a little table with wheels. I asked her if they ever had problems with kids trying to sneak into the room. She sighed sadly, rolled her eyes, and said that it happened all the time. I told her that they were having so much trouble because they had the wrong label on the door. She looked annoyed and, with a slight sneer, asked me sarcastically if I could suggest something better. I told her that kids wouldn't be even remotely interested in the place if it was labeled Actuarial Archives. She sniffed, turned her back on me, and continued stacking books. The book store was a bastion of creative thought and the woman was a real woman, with real authority.

A few years ago, I walked into the local library. I didn't have any use for the library then, and I still don't. I was there to carry a heavy load of books for my mother, who was in poor health. I stood and waited while my mother and the librarian swapped books, pleasantries, and gossip. Somebody said something that reminded me of a blonde joke. I started to tell the joke and the librarian suddenly turned on me, snarled, grew fangs, and eyes snapping, declared that she didn't allow blonde jokes in the library. I don't remember the color of her hair, but the library was a bastion of free speech, and the librarian was a real woman, with real authority. ♀

Reality Check

Sam Aurelius Milam III

Many black people whose ancestors were brought to America and forced into slavery are now living in America. Many black people whose ancestors were not brought to America and forced into slavery are now living somewhere in Africa.

Injustices in America should be addressed, when possible, and when they actually are injustices, but the tragic circumstances of those black people who were brought to America and forced into slavery have turned out to be a blessing for their present-day descendants. That is, instead of living in Africa, those descendants are living in America, which is widely alleged to be the best place to live on the entire planet. Whether it actually is or not is a matter of opinion but, nevertheless, people are struggling, enduring severe hardships and, in some cases, even dying, trying to get to America. So, what's the problem with those black people who're demanding reparations? Reparations for what? Reparations for living in America? Sure, they still have some difficulties as a legacy of slavery. Everybody has problems and grievances. Every population has a past but at least they're living in America. Maybe some of those black people who're living in Africa, the ones that I mentioned in the first paragraph, might like to trade places with the ones who're living in America, and not demand reparations.

I'm not proposing some stupid repatriation scheme. I'm suggesting that black people in America should reconsider their situations, their priorities, and their agendas. They could stop asking for free handouts. Instead, they could turn their efforts toward addressing injustices that really are injustices. There are plenty of those. Things are tough all over. ♀

On the morning edition of BBC World News America, on April 9, Nada Tawfik referred to the recent solar eclipse as an astrological phenomenon. Actually, it was an astronomical phenomenon. Hopefully, she understands the difference. A video clip showing her comment is available in the videos section of The Frontiersman Website. ♀

Church Jokes

Original Source Unknown. Forwarded by Marilyn, of Bingham County, Idaho.

Attending a wedding for the first time, a little girl asked her mother, "Why is the bride dressed in white?" The mother replied, "Because white is the color of happiness. Today is the happiest day of her life." The child then asked, "So why is the groom wearing black?"

Three boys in the school yard were bragging about their fathers. The first boy said, "My dad scribbles a few words on a piece of paper, calls it a poem, and they give him $50." The second boy said, "That's nothing. My dad scribbles a few words on a piece of paper, calls it a song, and they give him $100." The third boy said, "I got you both beat. My dad scribbles a few words on a piece of paper, calls it a sermon, and it takes eight people to collect all the money!" ∞
